We know from what follows that at this moment Ya'akov did not view his sons in their uniformity but in their characteristic diversity. Hence he now says to them: "Different though you are from one another, devote yourselves with that very diversity to the one spirit that unites you. Then I will reveal to you what will befall you in the end of days." Only when you will be imbued by one spirit will מחרים come.

When it is achieved, a Mesorah relationship between grand-father and grandchild contains an emotional intensity and intellectual closeness that in some ways transcends the parent-child relationship. Psychologically, one would not expect a deep identification between two individuals whose great discrepancy of years could easily spawn alienation. Yet grandparents, more so than parents, are sensitive to the transiency of time and to the pressing need to assure the perpetuation of one's lifelong principles. The child is far more than a biological extension; he embodies one's hopes for spiritual continuity. If, as is found frequently, a bond between old and young is achieved amongst Torah Jews, it is due to this singular awareness of a Mesorah community in which past and present generations are contemporaries.'

Jacob was the first patriarch to establish direct communication with his grandchildren. He was the first to make a solemn declaration, an historic pronouncement, which is responsible for the sense of closeness we still have with the past, thereby laying the foundation for the dialogue of the generations. He literally conquered time and space when he said to Joseph, "Now your two sons, who were born to you in the land of Egypt, before I came to you in Egypt, are mine. Ephraim and Menashe shall be mine, no less than Reuben and Simeon" (Gen. 48:5).

How appropriate, therefore, that our people is called Israel or Jacob, for it was he who created the Jewish community which ensures Jewish continuity. What preceded him were patriarchal families. He laid the foundation for a people. Though the covenant was made initially with Abraham, it was not until Jacob that the secret of perpetuating the Mesorah was discovered.

In a very real sense, this introductory period of Jewish history can be seen as a journey towards one specific moment, the moment when Yeakov lies on his deathbed surrounded by his children. Unlike Avraham and Yitzchak, each of whom had progeny who were lost to Jewish history, Yeakov now knows that all of his children intend to follow his ways. After three generations of struggle with outside influences and internal turmoil, the Hebrew family is finally whole. The patriarchal era can now safely end.

The journey of the patriarchal households to that moment teaches that before we could become a nation we had to be a family.

The Jewish home is and always has been the single most important educational unit in the perpetuation of our people. What our children learn at home, through example and word, shapes both their knowledge of and their attitude towards Jewish tradition and practice. The home's centrality finds its roots in the earliest moments of our people's story, in the journey of the patriarchal families, centuries before our nation is created.
